The origin of the name

The Bastioni Room takes its name from the remains of the old city walls, which are still visible in many areas of the city. A series of curtain walls and towers closed off the centre of the town, preventing it from enemy attacks. As was the case in many Italian cities, these walls were knocked down in the 19th century to allow roads to reach the city. The materials and forms used bear witness to the period of construction. The large blocks of local stone found at the base of the Arch of Augustus are from the ancient Roman era, whereas the bricks are of the Late-Antiquity, Medieval and Renaissance periods. The city was accessed by fortified doors which were closed every evening: still standing today are two from the Roman period - the Arch of Augustus and Porta Montanara - and some from Medieval times.
